PROFILE

Effective the first of August, W. David Laird moved from his position of associate director of libraries at the University of Utah to university librarian at the University of Arizona.

His tenure at Utah from June of 1967 through July of 1972 covered a wide spectrum of duties primarily in the technical services area. He rose from monographs order librarian to acquisitions librarian to assistant director for technical services. In 1971 he became associate director of libraries.

W. David Laird

While at the University of Utah he served the Utah Library Association on their Publications Council. He has also played a number of roles in ALA; he is now on the Resources and Technical Services Division organization committee, and was on ACRL's appointments and nominations committee (1970-71). He currently holds a Council on Library Resources fellowship to investigate title-by-title access to microfilm collections in major United States academic libraries.

While the problems of a new director are many, one of the major problems facing him as he begins at the University of Arizona will be the planning and construction of their new main library building. Though he did not assume his position until August, he became involved in the planning almost as soon as his appointment was approved.
