Librarians at Hamline University have become more than storekeepers who make sure the latest material is available. With the help of a 3M Microfilm System, they have become catalysts between the instructor and student.

At Hamline's Schilling Memorial Research Center, an entire curriculum is built around the library materials on microfilm. The librarian works with an instructor, helping him integrate the library resources with his instruction.

Instead of using this microfilm material for reference, the student now uses it as his original source. He can read about an event as it happened in the New York Times on microfilm, instead of in a history book. Rather than being spoon-fed the information, he puts his reasoning powers to use and compares a specific event with other world happenings of the same era.

The student can look up microfilm data in seconds on the screen of a 3M "400" Reader-Printer. If he wants a reference copy, he just pushes a button and has it in six seconds.

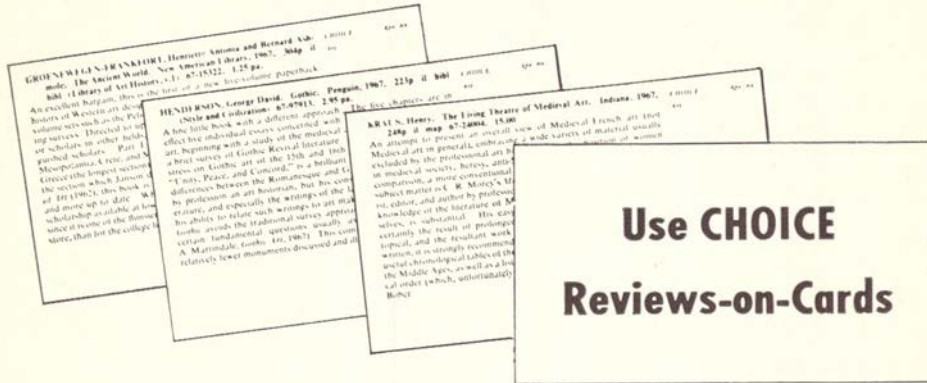

For more information, call your 3M Business Products Center or write to 3M Microfilm Systems, Dept. FFD-49, St. Paul, MN 55101.
