Drexel Library School Is OCLC Affiliate

The Drexel University Graduate School of Library Science has become the first library school to be an educational affiliate of the Ohio College Library Center (OCLC), Dean Guy Garrison has announced.

The Graduate School of Library Science will use the system totally for educational purposes, by special arrangement with the OCLC Board of Directors. Access to the data base will allow students to have direct hands-on experience in the classroom with one of the major technological innovations in the library field today.

Use of OCLC will supplement other on-line computer services already available through the school's information science laboratory, which presently provides access to bibliographic data bases through the System Development Corporation and the Lockheed Missiles and Space Co. The school also has on-line access to general-purpose computational facilities through the UNICOLL Corporation, a subsidiary of the University City Science Center, a regional consortium of educational and research institutions in the Philadelphia area.

Becoming an educational affiliate of OCLC is one more step in the expansion of the laboratory resources of the Graduate School of Library Science to accommodate a new doctoral program in library and information science and to enhance the existing master's degree program.
