The writings of Margaret Anna Cusack

(1829–99) are now in a special collection permanently housed at the Daniel A. Cannon Memorial Library at Saint Leo University. Cusack was a convert to Catholicism who became a nun, as well as a 19th-century social activist and prolific author. Writings by and about Cusack were donated to the library by Sisters Janet Davis Richardson and Rosalie McQuaide, both members of the Congregation of Sisters of St. Joseph of Peace, an order originally established by Cusack in the 1880s. In Ireland, Cusack was known as Sister Francis Clare. She wrote devotional materials for many years and a history of the country. She also worked on behalf of famine relief in Ireland, and advocated for the poor and the undereducated, becoming an advocate of peace and justice initiatives. She later came to the United States to work with young Irish women who emigrated to escape poverty. More than once, however, Cusack had difficult relationships with authorities in her adopted church. Ultimately, she left the religious life and returned to England, where she had been raised in the Anglican Church. ¶¶
