

tion and cooperation.

Does all of this sound familiar as you think about network development in the United States? Many American libraries, especially those committed to cooperation, have experienced automation growing pains as local to regional to nationwide impact networks have developed. And the consistent argument for networks has always been resource sharing and improved access to library materials and information.

Any library or group of libraries interested in automating to improve access to materials in a region should read this case study.—Betty W. Bender, Spokane Public Library, Washington.
